DENTAL HEALTH MONTH TODDLERS AND NURSING BOTTLE SYNDROME

Babies who fall asleep with a nursing bottle could become victims of "nursing bottle syndrome," a condition that causes severe decay of baby teeth.

The lactose in milk and fructose in juice combine with the bacteria in the mouth to produce acid that decays the teeth. If a child sleeps on one side, the teeth on that side will be more decayed since that is where the liquid from the bottle will accumulate. The same can also be true with prolonged breastfeeding.

The problem affects up to 6 percent of children under the age of four. In very severe cases, baby teeth can decay up to the gum line. In other cases, a parent brings a child to the dentist asking why the child's permanent teeth have not come in. The dentist often finds that the teeth came in but were decaying as fast as they were growing.

Parents can detect decay by regularly checking children's teeth for brown or white spots and noting missing teeth. Weaning children from the bottle or breast as soon as possible and proper brushing and flossing at an early age are the important steps in fighting the syndrome. When the first baby teeth have come in, the only liquid that a child should have in a bottle at bedtime is water. Parents need to help children clean their teeth until the child can do the job on their own. For further information, call the dental clinic at ext. 2477.
